Audrey is the Taiwanese transfeminine person responsible for becoming Taiwan's youngest ever government minister and has been appointed as Taiwan's Digital Minister. Making her first IT company at the age of 16, she became a globally renowned name, going on to work for Apple's artificial intelligence program where she helped to design newer versions of Siri. She is a genius 'beyond gender,' with her gender listed in the Taiwanese governmental cabinet as 'none.' She developed a platform for people in her country to communicate directly with the government, breaking barriers not often faced in democratic countries. She also devised a system that allowed Taiwan to participate virtually in the United Nations, something that the country has long been unable to do. Quick-witted and transparent, Audrey has given voices to those often silenced and proven to the world that we need more people like her in government.
